Uncle Sam is proving to be a poor messenger boy for Germany. He don't bring back the right answer.

New Hampshire had another fast day April 26, but we cannot see that it accelerated the pace of our neighbor to any extent.

For a still, that contraption found in a Back Bay, Boston, home has made a lot of noise. Perhaps more so because the occupant of the home has Agassiz for a middle name and is an instructor in Harvard university.

It goes without saying that the United States would rather take a chance collecting the allies' debt from the allies rather than from Germany. The latter country is too much inclined to giving I-O-U notes in place of specie or goods.

One of the most disagreeable features of the discussion between Germany and the allies is the action of Von Bernstorff in thrusting himself into the limelight. Some of his American friends ought to bring on the flowers again.

Commenting on Barre's proposal to hire a full-time secretary of the Board of Trade, the Barton Monitor declares it a good idea and that "Vermont towns need to awake from their smug complacency." That's right; let's not be laid out before it's time.

Frederick Roy Martin, the new general manager of the Associated Press, the great world gatherer of news, was born in North Stratford, N. H., so near Vermont that he could almost be claimed as a Vermonter. North Stratford is just across the Connecticut river from the little village of Bloomfield.

The fatality attending an attempt to turn an automobile around on a narrow road in the town of Waterbury would have been repeated countless times in other cases had it not been that an ascending bank stopped the backing vehicle as it went off the road in the attempt, whereas in the case at hand a descending bank let the machine and driver down a steep declivity. Probably nearly every driver has experienced the sensation and has thanked the kindly rising bank for preventing a plunge off the highway. The moral of the Waterbury accident is that it is unwise to attempt to turn on a narrow road, where there is a descent on one side or both.

So much interest is being taken in orthography in some sections of the state that the newspapers are printing the names of the best spellers instead of the best sellers now. Spelling contests are being held in the schools and the almost "lost art" is being revived to a remarkable degree. The newspapers are doing their part by presenting the advantages of good spelling as contrasted with the disadvantages of incorrect spelling; and they are also adding a further incentive to the attainment of proficiency in orthography by printing the names of the winners. No doubt every newspaper in the state would lend itself to such a purpose if the school children should show enough interest to engage in such contests. Poor spelling is one of the evils of present-day conditions, in school and out of school.

STATE FAIR ON THE DEFENSIVE.

The dates have been fixed for the Vermont state fair and other arrangements made for the 1921 exhibition, which may be taken to be an indication that the state fair commission will not resign despite the rumors following the failure of Gov. Hartness to sign the bill providing more barn accommodations at the state fair grounds. The results of the 1921 exhibition will go far toward determining the future of the state fair. It has become evident of late that a more or less concerted effort is under way to abolish the state fair or to combine it with some fair already in existence. One of the chief reasons for this effort is the alleged unfavorable location at White River Junction. However, it is yet to be demonstrated satisfactorily that White River Junction is an unfavorable location. That village has as good railroad connections as any place in the state, is located on several trunk lines of highways, is so near New Hampshire and Massachusetts as to command considerable support from the people of those states, is gradually reached from most points of Vermont as any section in the state, is located near one of the most populous villages of the state, and has a field that lends itself quite readily to the needs of a great exhibition. There are some of the reasons why the state fair seems to be well located, with a minimum of drawbacks. Having those advantages, it should be in a position to make good, providing, of course, that the management is favored with decent weather during the week of exhibition. Public sentiment is still with the state fair except, perhaps, in certain localities; and it remains for the fair management to put on a good exhibition in order to win further support from the public.

Unselfishness

Selfishness as a trait in human nature is deplorable and the person who seeks the fullest enjoyment of life is constantly guarding against this natural enemy.

One who saves is very often spoken of as a selfish person but judging the act by its purpose, it is readily seen that this is a misnomer and an unjust characterization of a generous act.

As to the purpose of saving, it is not done primarily to accumulate money, money as such doesn't do anybody any particular good; it is done for the purpose of protection and service, for protection against sickness, old age, for the purpose of giving the children an education, buying a home, enjoying many of the social advantages that accrue as a matter of self-development.

Are these things selfish? Absolutely not!

Depositors who have become interested in saving through our efforts have told us, "I am experiencing a new joy; I am finding and developing new powers—I am discovering myself."

CURRENT COMMENT

How to Use the Roads.

Let every person who uses the highways this summer, whether by car, team or on foot, determine to use much common sense in the use of such public road. If automobilists will cut out the speed-craze, if teams will carry lights at night, and if pedestrians will proceed with precision in something like a definite course, there will be fewer accidents. Safety first, is still a good motto for all who traverse our highways.—Barton Monitor.
